McKinley has covered many fairytales in her novels, but this is the one that haunts me the most. Based on Perrault's "Donkeyskin" Deerskin is the story of princess Lissla Lissar, daughter of the most beautiful woman in the world. Her mother's dying request is that her husband only marry a woman as beautiful as her - and that becomes her daughter.

Having read and enjoyed Beauty, by Robin McKinley, I had high expectations for Deerskin. These expectations were not realised. Re-reading Beauty, I realised that McKinley is firmly entrenched in the 'tell, don't show' camp. I felt like it worked in Beauty.

From a writing perspective, Robin McKinley tends towards the verbose and the ornate – sometimes this works for her books, and sometimes (in my opinion) it does not. I am happy to say that Deerskin is one of the successful endeavors, with its beautiful, languid prose, vivid images and descriptions.
